

I support the right of Americans to broadcast on low-wattage FM stations and would like to see the FCC legitimize the practice. In a media society like ours this is nothing less than a bread and butter free speech issue. Neighborhood radio is a great idea and need not be treated as either a threat to the security of the state or the profit margins of the corporate radio giants. There is no need to insist either that the stations be non-commercial; that is just one more impediment to what would already be a small operation. The very smallness of the operations should be enough to keep them in local, locally concerned hands.
