

I strongly support the FCC's Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in regard to the establishment of licenses for low-power community radio stations. The airwaves belong to the public, and yet the cost of obtaining an FM or AM signal has removed radio from the reach of average citizens. Low-power stations would greatly improve the quality of the public airwaves and the diversity of public discourse. I hope the FCC will not be dissuaded by the predictable outcry of broadcasting lobbyists and the senators and representatives tied to their pursestrings. There is room for everyone.
