

In the matter of low power radio stations, it seems evident that their importance to the preservation of diversity of expression is invaluable. That diversity is something that benefits our nation could, I suppose, be argued, but not --in my opinion-- without trampling upon the spirit of the constitution, and the Bill of Rights in particular.

In the same vein, I throw the entire weight of my opinion as a citizen toward the creation, support, and maintenance of what have been termed 'micro' stations. For the reasons stated above, but even more so, these would enhance the quality of life for many whose tastes and desires deviate from those offered by larger sources, which need ever to be mindful of offending --and therefore might tend to err on the side of dilution.
