

To re-establish a public agora of the radio airwaves, the FCC has no better course than to approve low power radio broadcasting. Corporate owned and operated commercial radio has filled the airwaves with an insidious pablum that has cloned itself over the entire country, killing regional diversity and individuality. Low power radio would provide a broader base of opportunity for a wide range of groups currently shut out of cheap, versatile communications. The FCC would do well to encourage the diversity and vibrancy that low power broadcasting would bring to the current FM wasteland.
