Dear Sirs:

As operators of four north Missouri radio stations, we strongly feel low power FM is a bad idea. Specifically, alteration of existing interference protection standards will result in increased interference to existing broadcaster's signals. THE FCC is proposing to allow pirate broadcasters to apply for LPFM licenses as long as they voluntarily cease operating an unlicensed station. However, the Commission refuses to allow applications for an LPFM station from any person who has an attributable interest in a broadcast station, thusly, the LPFM proposal is a reward to pirate broadcasters who have been violating the law! Regardless of whether an LPFM service is established, the pirate problem will still exist...and will likely get worse. In addition, the FCC does not have the resources to deal with the introduction of hundreds of new stations in which the majority of new licenses will have near zero experience in operating a station and/or won't be concerned with operating under any regulations. In conclusion, we strongly feel "Micro-radio" will create havoc and interference on existing local radio frequencies in every American community, disrupting the community service, news, information and entertainment programming upon which millions of consumers depend.

Sincerely,

Mike Ransdell
