

I would like to comment on low power and community radio. In the last two decades radio media has been concentrated in fewer hands. At the same time, requirements for radio stations to provide public access have been reduced. As our population grew, radio stations airspace has become much more valuable.

Today, alternative voices are virtually priced out of the radio spectrum. For-profit stations are required first and foremost to provide a dollar return to the stockholders.

Please open the airwaves to low power and community stations. Our country requires a free exchange of ideas to survive. Our current broadcast radio system is not holding it's own in providing public service.

Sincerely,

Greg Filter
