

I have been reading with great interest some of the comments received thus far regarding this proceeding. I have to disagree strongly with the alarmist notions and misleading science put forth by the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB). I'm sure that the FCC is competent enough to judge the scientific merits of their so-called "studies", and I believe the mere consideration of this proposal is evidence that the FCC understands how the current commercial nature of American radio is shaping our public airwaves into a forum that appropriately serves an ever narrowing segment of our society based on demographics and affluence.

The extreme diversity of services emerging today in the internet realm serves as a clear reminder that openness and competition will more quickly produce useful benefits to society than a system which favors the voices of those with large pockets.
