

The FCC's proposal to license low power fm stations is a unique chance to widen an ever decreasing broadcast license ownership pool. In order to give voice to a more diverse group of people and widen the programming choices, these stations should be operated by citizens who do not currently hold a high power license in the same market. To allow current license holders these frequencies would only serve to ensure the tightening grip of the elite group of owners who still hold the misguided belief that they, and not the people of this country, own the airwaves. Lets put at least some of the broadcast frequencies back in to the hands of people who might try to give the public entertainment, information and real public service that they might otherwise miss on a corporately held station.
