

The potential for harmful interference by power line broadband far outweighs the benefits promised. Broadband connectivity using existing Cable Television and DSL wireline distribution provides a usable resource without causing interference. Future fiber optic distribution systems will enhance bandwidth also without causing harm to other spectrum users. We should be finding ways to limit interference rather than creating more new sources of interference.

Respectfully Submitted

James A. Morton

WA6FWW