

I can not believe that BPL is a topic even being tossed around, much less on the docket for consideration. If a corporation as notable and highly respected as the BBC reports significant signal degradation due to Broadband Over Power Lines, we have no business even contemplating such a thing. I must agree with the ITU, that any noise due to BPL is unacceptable and certainly not in the public interest. As a consumer, I don't want to lose anymore commercial signals due to infringement of an eclectic industry over that of many others. As a HAM Radio operator, I clearly see this step as one that will surely cripple my ability to operate in modes used for public service and will undoubtedly extend, beyond my financial and physical means, the ability to offer my services as a public servant. I see no benefit from such a loss.
