

While the FCC should insure that broadband access by electricity providers does not interfere with radio traffic, the decision should be based on scientific facts, not assumptions or chicken-little cries from ARRL members. There are locales where the service is being provided, and there seems to be no complaints of radio interference in those areas.