

I'm a little concerned about the overreaction to the halftime show, honestly because musically, it may have been the best one ever. I'm not quite sure, but isn't your stereotypical football/superbowl fan some overweight guy with a beer in his hand and if not then why does society spend so much time attempting to market to this type of person. I don't ever remember the Superbowl being a family event, it isn't on the disney channel or doesn't precede Mr. Rogers. Half of the marketing ideas for the superbowl are based around beer and pizza and sitting in front of the couch watching football. America has an underage drinking problem but they don't stop beer commercials. Why? Because it's all about the money. This show was a very good one regardless of what people say. They just need to get over it. If your kid has drinks before 21 it's his choice and the parent's fault not Budweiser, if your kid has underaged sexual intercourse it's their choice and maybe the parent's fault, not Janet Jackson for showing her breast. The NFL needs all the help it can get. They are trying to turn a sport in which men run into each other and hit each other as hard as they can into sophisticated event. Get over it.
