

The existence of BPL has been demonstrated to be a real and not imagined threat to HF communications on bands allocated to amateur radio and government agencies. As a result, BPL has been banned in Japan and at least one other advanced country in Europe because of this proven incompatibility. What makes the U.S. RF environment any different other than perhaps well-applied political pressure from power company lobbyists?