

The use of BPL will have a negative impact on the amateur radio frequencies already assigned by the FCC. In addition, other radio frequencies could interfere with BPL, thus making both amateur radio and the internet and other transmissions over power lines unappealing and costing those who invest in this FCC venture a good deal of time, effort and money. Other countries have tried this system of transmission with negative results and the United States should learn from them instead of learning from a mistake.